Bruin weighed an ounce or two over 300 pounds when it was laid low by the unerring aim of Peter Albinola, a former Barre man, in Kellogg, Idaho, last April. Mr. Albinola is an old mountain hunter and returned from a week's hunt in April with two big black bears. One of the animals was sent to a taxidermist, who converted the skin into an elegant rug. Mr. Prostini received it from his uncle as a birthday gift a short time ago.

The Barre Bottling works this week entered into the soda bottling business, having opened an extensive plant in the Cleary building on North Main street, which was formerly occupied by the Green bakery. The plant is owned and conducted by Louis Pochetti, who recently came to this city from Northfield, where he has been closely allied with the Northfield Bottling Co. for some time past. This is not Mr. Pochetti's first appearance in Barre business circles. For five years he was the chief director of the Barre Co-operative store, now operated on Granite street. For the past 10 years he has resided in Northfield. The plant has good dimensions and is equipped with all the modern facilities. Throughout, the works are nothing but new machinery. The most conspicuous set of machinery in the building is the filler, with its car-bonator attachments. The other machinery consists of siphon fillers, corking machine, labeller and washers. The machinery is of the Rosendell make. Mr. Pochetti intends to add sausage manufacturing. He has already installed a machine to carry on this work, although he will not undertake its manufacture for some time.
